EQUIPMENT REVIEW

Panasonic is a company that many people may not generally associate with photography, but over the past three years they have released some of the most popular cameras on the market. Their development of the mirrorless Micro Four Thirds system helped introduce an entirely new class of camera that blends the image quality and control of a Digital Single Lens Reflex (DSLR) camera, with the size and portability of a point and shoot. Similar to a DSLR, the Micro Four Thirds system allows the use of interchangeable lenses, but it does away with the reflex mirror and optical viewfinder making the body of the camera much smaller than even the most compact DSLR's.

The Panasonic G10 is the fourth Micro Four Thirds camera released by Panasonic to date. It is the lightest camera featuring a built-in electronic viewfinder. The G10's body is constructed of metal and is wrapped in a grippy rubber compound making it easy to hold. Its back features a three inch LCD screen that either displays the camera settings, or when in live view mode, allows you to compose your photos. The heart of the camera is its 12-megapixel CMOS sensor with an impressive ISO range of 100iso-6400iso. In addition to taking great still images, the G10 also has a movie mode that can capture 1280x720 HD video files at 30 frames per second. The G10 comes with an image stabilized 14-42mm 3x zoom lens, but can accept any Micro Four Thirds lens on the market.

The G10 is powered by a rechargeable lithium-ion battery that can take on average 350 shots per charge. It can record in either JPEG or the RAW image format and accepts SD memory cards. The small size and image quality of the Panasonic G10 makes it a great camera for someone looking to step up from a point and shoot without having to deal with the size and complexity of a full size DSLR. It's also a fine choice for a DSLR shooter who wants to down size their camera equipment without sacrificing their creative control and image quality.
